Exam Construction
The exam consists of approximately 100 items, all multiple-choice, with only 1 correct answer per item. There is no penalty for guessing. If you skip an item, obviously you get that one wrong.

The exam is built on the blueprint with the idea that if there is a smaller rubric with less hours, there will be less questions than a larger rubric would contain.

Validation Items
Some exam versions have more than 100 items as they include questions still in assessment mode. If you miss them, they won’t count against your score.

Time Limit
There is a 3-hour time limit for the exam, either paper/pencil or online.

Pass Score
Pass score is 65%.

Getting the Results
The online version provides an immediate score and the paper/pencil version will have a short delay of maybe 24 - 48 hours. Most people pass on the first take if they have prepared in a professional fashion.

Preparation – The Core Reading List
All questions are sourced to the Core Reading List posted on our website: http://www.bcia.org/i4a/pages/index.cfm?pageid=3481.

We suggest starting with the Demos book if you do not have a strong neuroscience background and then working through the other texts. The Neurofeedback Book has questions in the back and people find this a good way to double check their mastery of certain topics. If you do well on a certain group of questions, it means that you probably do know the material and should do well – even though those questions are not repeated on our exam. The Neurofeedback book is now available digitally from AAPB and is a must for your bookshelf.

The Evidence-Based Practice book, also available digitally from AAPB – read the first section describing how the evidence levels are determined and be comfortable in understanding what is a 1, 2, 3, etc. Next review the topics where Neurofeedback has been highly rated. You don’t have to memorize that whole text and the ratings for each disorder.

Spend a few minutes reviewing the BCIA Ethical Principles document to note what a certification means vs a license and how BCIA handles complaints.

That should well prepare you for the exam.
